The Past

The corpses wait under my bed
as if not quite bony enough for the closet, already so full.

Whatever in life they were deprived of
they claim as their own.

Between the bed and the closet:
all those without final residence,
hovering.

On the floor the things a broom is trying to sweep
under the rug,

but they, too, just rise
into the air, stay.

And the writing on the wall—
how suddenly contemptible
the visible seems.

The future's here.
Even when I wake it doesn't go away.
